

Pathways to

Medicine for Indigenous Australians

Are you passionate about improving health outcomes for your community? If you answered “YES”, study medicine at The University of Queensland.

The University of Queensland is committed to increasing the number of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander students studying medicine. UQ, together with the Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Studies Unit, has designed two Admissions Pathway Schemes to encourage more of our mob to study medicine.

What is the Doctor of Medicine?

UQ's Doctor of Medicine (MD) is a four-year postgraduate program that is one of the most highly regarded medical programs in Australia. During your studies you will master clinical sciences and a range of practical skills to prepare you for the challenges and rewards of being a doctor.

Before starting the MD Program, you must have completed an undergraduate program.

There are two pathways into the MD Program:

Provisional
Entry
(for Year 12
students)

Graduate
Entry
(for university graduates)

Eligibility requirements

Provisional entry - Year 12 students

- Applicants must be in Year 12 and eligible for an ATAR or equivalent
- Applicants must have passed the subject prerequisites for entry into their preferred first degree
- Applicants DO NOT have to sit the UCAT
